

There are many ways to talk about the body. Yet, there are also many ways to practice and visualize bodies. In this conference we aim to have an input selection of versions and repertoires of bodies in the analyses offered by STS and social science approaches. The body is the primary environment in which we live, the physical boundary that identifies us, as "unique individuals", and the other, other bodies. Science and technology have focused on the task of knowing, opening, modifying, slicing, describing and prescribing notions on bodies. For this conference, we do not wish to start with a predetermined idea of what a body is and what are its borders but we seek to analyze, however, the many bodies that can be enacted by different practices and the "partial connections" between them. Thus we invite contributions to the conference that seek to offer a version of the body, topographically or analytically, empirically or theoretically.

What other repertoires could be mobilized to talk, practice, and visualize bodies? What are the networks that can be made visible to talk about them? (The destruction of the public and the erosion of the commons and its effects on bodies, the fluidity of notions of the "patient" and "illness", the metabolic and gastric functions of eating for which without no bodies will survive, etc.)
